Ask for help from your representative:

If a congressional office is asked to help get information from a federal agency, families must first complete a digital privacy release form so the agency will release your records. Without these forms, offices cannot get real-time updates from agencies, and delays can mean days without answers.

To be prepared, immigrant community members can proactively fill out a privacy release form with their congressional representative before an emergency arises. That way, if support is needed, your representative can act quickly on your behalf.

WORKSITE AUDITS & RAIDS

More than one million Washingtonians (1 in 6) are immigrants. Immigration enforcement actions at workplaces are a tactic used to detain a large group of individuals and are on the rise in our state. In this context, employers should take steps to prepare for encounters with ICE through I-9 audits and workplace immigration raids.

TOOLS FOR EMPLOYERS:

Work with the Washington Immigrant Solidarity Network to ensure that appropriate protocols for safely engaging with immigration enforcement authorities at your business are in place and support is available for your employees:

- Print and display WAISN's "Know Your Rights with Immigration" flyers in common areas such as the employee breakroom.
- Develop and train staff on protocols (see reverse side of this flyer) for engaging with immigration officials if they appear at your business or attempt to contact your employees while on the job.
- Designate which areas of your business are closed to the public with clearly marked signage. See the sample signage below.

- Host a Know-Your-Rights training for your employees with a trusted community organization.
- Maintain contact information for an immigration attorney who will be able to advise you in the event of immigration enforcement activities affecting your business.
